Financial Disclosure

The Financial Aid Office at Santa Fe University of Art & Design is committed to helping students obtain the maximum amount of financial assistance possible. However, students must assume responsibility for complying with all requirements necessary to process their financial aid. Additionally, the Financial Aid Office is not responsible for any student's financial obligations to the university. Students must individually make sure that all financial obligations are properly met.

Information in this guide is subject to change with revised regulations and guidelines. The information on this site is provided for general guidance only. Information may change in order to reflect SFUAD’s compliance with current institutional policy or federal and state laws and regulations that guide the financial aid industry.

Please keep in mind that the numbers previously mentioned are based on the ‘average student award’ at Santa Fe University of Art & Design. Student eligibility is impacted by various factors such as grade level, household size, and household income. The financial aid analysis changes every year, so the results will vary per student.

The estimated cost of attendance for the 2016-2017 year has not been formally approved by the executive council. Cost of attendance information is subject to change. Our Net Price Calculator mimics the institutional methodology (IM) and provides a simulation to help estimate a student’s financial situation.

A thorough review of the information provided via the application requirements will be completed before a qualifying need-based financial aid package is formally offered. Please be aware that that this calculation varies from the federal calculation that is provided with the FAFSA. For example, IM expects a minimum contribution from both the student and parent as part of the financial aid awarding process, while the federal calculation does not. The Net Price Calculator does not automatically account for scholarships that may be offered by the campus.
